Summary:

In recent years, a steadily growing number of initiatives around Europe that aim to combat racism in sport are being observed. However, the vast majority of these actions mainly focus on professional sport and football while UNESCO and organizations such as Kik it Out that are dedicated in working to root out the problem of racism out of football, highlight that the problem is the same in amateur football (including youth football) as it is at the professional level. The same psychosocial 'mechanisms' exist, it is just not that known due to limited coverage by the media. Moreover, it is noted that players themselves often use racist discourse among themselves ‘in provocative strategic attitudes of destabilisation’ that are simply ‘part of the social game’”. Most importantly, UNESCO’s report stresses the lack of empirical studies on the ground.

The aforementioned points verify and further Bradbury’s (2002) assertion that there is a lack of actions that focus on combating racism and xenophobia incidents in amateur sports. Unfortunately, racism is making a resurgence around Europe and football represents another field where it is being expressed, witnessed and felt. Additionally, there has been limited action and work to address it at a grassroots level, namely where there is limited coverage and support for the players, coaches and fans involved. Taking into consideration that this often involves young players and children makes the need for action in the field ever so present. As a result, these observations have served as the driving factors in designing the plan for the TACKLE project and the Consortium’s decision to focus on grassroots football.

It is also important to take into consideration the number of people involved in grassroots football. Namely, Bradbury (2013) estimates that around 21 million people are registered to take part in organised amateur football in the UK and Europe. In this regard, there is a need for a wider approach to the fight against racism, which should start from the bottom of the sporting pyramid, namely the grassroots and the amateur clubs and academies. Moreover, and despite the fact that racist incidents often appear in football fields, the power of the sport to bring people together and to promote respect and tolerance must be harnessed in order to contribute to the pan-European attempt to tackle racism and xenophobia.

Thus, the project responds to the increasing calls for action to address the rising number of incidents of discrimination and violence in grassroots football. Unfortunately the issue is underreported and there has been limited research and information both at a European level and in each of the participating countries on the extent of the problem and its effect on young players and grassroots football in general. Most importantly, there is limited information, guidelines, resources and support for grassroots (youth and amateur) staff and coaches to be in a position to actively address incidents of racism and adequately guide and support their players.

TACKLE actively contributes in combating racism, discrimination and intolerance in sport by putting forward a comprehensive approach to address and assist in rooting out racism in football, specifically in grassroots football. To that end, the project focuses on coaches and managers working in clubs that per UEFA's definition is the "non-professional football and includes among others youth football and amateur football". To do so, the project will benefit from the collective multidisciplinary expertise of the implementing project team that is comprised by organizations that possess in depth know-how in the field of football, sports, education and training, integration and inclusion. The project participation of

and the

that has been actively working on reporting and addressing racism in football for many years will make a concrete contribution across all stages of the project work including the development, implementation and dissemination of the project products.

Objectives:

TACKLE aims to

- develop applied tools and methodologies that will help to proactively prevent and mitigate racism, xenophobia and other forms of intolerance in football by raising awareness and undertaking capacity building activities for professionals working in football, and more specifically in grassroots football clubs.

- raise awareness and guide its target groups to get a better understanding of the forms xenophobia and racism are being expressed in football and their adverse effects to footballers, the sport and society in general. It will do so with specifically catered training material that addresses the needs and the special context within which these professionals operate in transferring concepts and practices from other principles (social sciences, non-formal education) to sport.

- identify, enhance and promote best practices to prevent and mitigate hatred related issues in grassroots football through the development and implementation of a toolkit followed by capacity building activities for football coaches – and related stakeholders- but also wider audiences.

- create a knowledge transfer pool to share the experiences acquired through the implementation providing valuable information for the wider application of the developed tools at wider EU and international scales.

- help generate a better understanding of the present modus operandi in the field, generate knowledge and understanding of the issues and challenges at hand and contribute in the formulation and setting in place responses to tackle racism to first and foremost safeguard young children in football and assist in rooting out the phenomenon.
